Delegates of the Environmental Commission

The Environmental Commission (EC) is committed to safeguarding our environment, making sure that future generations can rely on sustainable solutions which can allow them to prosper. The Environmental Commission was established in 1972 and then came into force in March 1994, which led to nations recognizing major environmental issues, like industrial pollution and deforestation. The Environmental Commission was made up of only 58 members actively participating until the UNEP Governing Council decided to include the participation of all 193 UN members in the Commission.

Under the United Nations Environment Programme, the Environmental Commission serves as the highest-level decision-making body in the UN dedicated to the environment. It aims at uniting the international community to shape global environmental law. The Environmental Commission is dedicated to ecological governance, sustainability and planetary health. Making sure that nations are always including the environment in their future goals.

This year's AMMUN conference "Moderating Morality" plays a crucial role in the Environmental Commission. As it forces nations to balance economic growth while also maintaining the ethical duty to protect the planet and maintain it for future generations. This theme ensures fairness and climate justice, while also making sure that nation's development is not halted to deal with environmental issues. The Environmental Commission ensures that everyone is held accountable and that all nations regardless of their development status have an impact in battling the biggest issues our planet faces today.

As participants in AMMUN a THIMUN affiliated conference, there are high expectation put in place. Delegates must be present on time always, ready to engage in meaningful debate. Delegates are expected to have all necessary equipment ready and with them during debate. Delegates are also expected to research the topics beforehand. Moreover, delegates are expected to research their delegation's foreign beforehand. Every participant is expected to remain respectful at all times, while also refraining from using personal pronouns during moderated caucus. The chairing panel will ensure that all delegates are receiving the support that they need and will provide meaningful guidance throughout the conference. The chairing panel will also ensure that everyone is participating and getting a chance to contribute.

Khader Abukhader

President of the Environmental Commission